7.9% by the end of 2026.

"The revised forecast reflects a more measured view of near-term performance," said Grant Montgomery, National Director of Multifamily Analytics at CoStar Group. "Still, a turning point is approaching. In the final quarter of 2025, renters are expected to occupy more units than are added to supply — a first since the third quarter of 2021. That shift should allow vacancy to begin receding in 2026, supported by a shrinking construction pipeline and steady renter demand."

The updated outlook also accounts for slower growth in employment, population, and household formation, which may delay absorption in oversupplied markets. However, limited for-sale housing inventory continues to support multifamily demand by keeping many renters priced out of homeownership.
