In Q1 2026, roughly 64.2 million square feet of retail space was under construction in the U.S., down from approximately 70 million square feet a year earlier and well below the 10-year average, which consistently exceeded 90 million square feet during the last expansion cycle.

Construction volumes now sit near levels last seen in the early stages of the post-pandemic recovery, underscoring the degree to which supply growth has disconnected from demand fundamentals.

"The pullback in construction reflects a development environment that remains difficult to pencil in most markets," said Brandon Svec, national director of retail analytics at CoStar Group. "The sharp rise in land prices, construction costs, and interest rates over the past several years has pushed required rents well above prevailing market levels for many retail formats. Even in markets with strong population growth and leasing demand, achieving returns that justify ground up construction has become increasingly challenging."

"Beyond cost pressures, developers remain cautious following years of heightened supply risk awareness, while retailers continue to favor measured, capital disciplined expansion strategies," said Svec. "Competition for sites from higher density residential, industrial, and mixed-use projects further constrains retail development opportunities, particularly in infill locations. At the same time, ongoing competition with ecommerce for consumer spending, especially within soft goods categories, has reinforced a preference for smaller footprints and selective growth rather than broad-based expansion."

Among markets, Dallas, Houston and Austin lead the way in construction activity. In the aforementioned Texas markets and several high-growth southern metros, a significant share of space under construction is already pre-leased, reflecting strong tenant demand for well-located, modern product.

In contrast, several markets outside the South show higher levels of unleased space, signaling more cautious tenant commitments or projects that are further along in the delivery timeline.
